- Heathcote Reception Home
- Heathcote Mental Hospital
- Heathcote Hospital

Details

Heathcote began in 1929 on Point Heathcote at Applecross. It was first known as the Heathcote Reception Home, and was a government hospital for people with 'recent and recoverable' mental illness. Heathcote sometimes housed Children and adolescents. It closed in 1994.

The Royal Commission into Lunacy recommended in 1922 that a new hospital be built to treat people with acute 'mental disorders'. The Commissioners believed there was 'no marked line dividing sanity from insanity; there are degrees intervening which must be recognised and provided for...there is, so to speak, nothing between sanity and Claremont'. They described a movement away from the custodial model to a more active treatment model of care: 'insanity is a disorder insidious in character and slow in onset; that more often than one can accurately estimate, the patient goes through a period – varying in each case – during which skilled treatment, properly administered, will prevent an impending attack or successfully deal with it in its early stages' (pp.6-7). Heathcote, as the hospital was named, was to be that observation and treatment centre.

In its Report (p.7), the Royal Commission was specific in its description of the future 'Acute Mental Hospital and Reception Centre' – in what it should include by way of patients, facilities, staff and treatments; and in whom it should exclude: 'senile dementers, well-marked congenital defectives, obviously chronic insanity, general paralysis and epilepsy'.

When Heathcote was established, it was not only seen as a remedy to the overcrowding at Claremont. Heathcote was intended to admit patients who did not suffer from what were thought in 1929 to be 'incurable' illnesses such as senility, epilepsy or 'mental deficiency'. Those patients would continue to be sent to Claremont.
